European Armies Are More Friendly to Motion Picture Cameraman

Motion picture cameramen are becoming more popular with the European armies in the field than they were at the beginning of the war, and the chances are that the history of the great conflict will, after all, be recorded in film, at least so far as the engagements from now on are concerned.

Patrons of motion picture theaters have noticed a new series of films that are being shown by one of the big producing companies, which seems to be devoted entirely to the war and to have official sanction This is the first indication of motion picture activity that has been going on in Europe for several weeks, Germany, Belgium, France, and Russia have all fallen into line. England still remains a bit obdurate and places all sorts of obstacles in the way of making actual war pic-

It is believed that most of the governments did take a num-ber of pictures for record and pri-vate view. But none of these was vate view. But none of these was permitted to be shown publicly. Germany refused to permit repre-sentatives of motion picture companies to accompany troops at the beginning of the war, but the charges of atroctiles against the Ger-man army brought about a change of heart. Pictures were made and sent out to the world to show that the German troops were most hu-mane.

Then came the thrilling series of plctures that were made by Edwin F. Weigel, of the Chicago Tribune staff in Belgium, with the sanction of the Belgium government. These were the first films shown in this country which had any actual battle scenes. France has now started a series of pictures, those which have been referred to as having been shown in Washington recently. But even with this co-operation on the part of the governments the camera men are having a hard time of it.

It seems that the heads of the various governments are anxious to get films before the public for the effect they will have on national spirit and on the attitude of neutral nations. The military in the field have too much to do to pay much attention to the outside world, however, and so they put all the obstacles in the way of the picture makers they can.

"One restriction after another was placed in the way of cinematographers filming the European conflict, and it is entirely due to their pluck and resourcefulness that the war thus far has been filmed so extensively. The photographer has had quite an easy time of it in comparison, for he can snap-shot almost evtrything and is not handicapped with a heavy tripod machine and accessories.

"If the cinematographer were to obey the belligerents, we would not get a single view of actual warfare. With his natural yearning for action, and then being confined to the tame incidental affairs such as troops marching and wrecked buildings, he would surely be driven to distraction. You cannot be surprised at his caring nothing for red tape, especially when the interests of us movie fans have to be upheld."
